was issued to please John CHAMPION who wished a straight number one and to convince myself that I am still a science fiction author.

The title of the following story

MAN

(and I swear it has been written as it was thought,

and that it has been thought in English.

If, naturally, it is English you are about to read)

to Jean and Annie LJNARD

whose confidence in myself

. is guilty though communicative

Had they not thrust me

into Fandom

this ffm wouldn't have seen the light of days to come.

SUCH A RESPONSIBILITY !..

he first words they said, when at last they came, were: "Where are they? Show us in the least some of them, we must know! Don't you understand that we must know?"

It was a glorious afternoon, warm and quiet (maybe too quiet?), full of wandering jewels riding upon green and golden rays high in the sky. What cannot happen when such a day clothes the earth with an air filled with the very scents of life?

This shining object which whirled furiously, as if it were alive, right in the middle of the glade, made us blink. We knew it from old stories, as old as Mankind, but never had we seen one with our own eyes. And we wondered if it was real in the sense we think trees and grass and birds to be real ones, or a mere projection of some thought far far away, as a few tales suggested.

As for the strangers, the same question was in our minds. They were visible enough, not whirling at all, but we couldn't help shuddering a little. They were far too much like us, and we never liked the idea not to be left alone, to admit them without a kind of disquietude and bitterness.

And they came, they came, sure of their right to come, no trouble showing through their eyes, as if nothing, no one could cross their path, immune from the sorrows which fell instantly upon us, why immune?...

It was no longer a glorious day. The birds, above, feeling immediately the change, went gliding near the top of the trees, but far away from us, not daring, not daring. If only we could, I thought. But no, we can't copy beasts, else why keep thinking and wondering and doing things with a purpose? A bundle of clouds were gathering around the hill and the new-born wind threw them at us. Already, the trees surrounding the glade were shaken by the beginning storm.

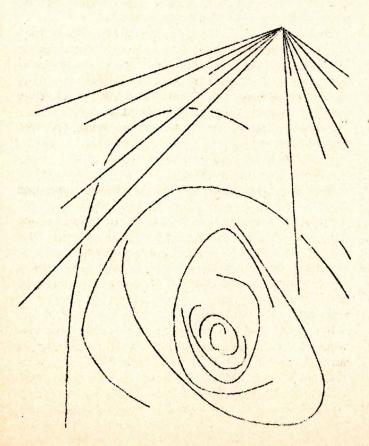

"Well ?.." I said to the nearest stranger, who was not ten feet away.

He didn't answer. Had he, anyhow the thunder rolling inceasingly would have drowned his words and their meanings, if they had any. It was now nearly dark, although all around us was lighted every second by the fire which the sky gives the earth and which the earth gives back the sky.

their machine, giving us the peace of mind we waited for. And when the Moon raised her head from behind the hill, still we heard nothing beyond the crying of our children whose hunger kept them awake. Jess had had no time for the hunting. She gave them a piece of wood as to quiet them, and five minutes later they were again asleep.

Then we went out and watched together the storm lull, the machine whirl and the Moon travel, and we listened to the great felines roaring far away, to the soft flips of the last drops left by the rain on the large green leaves and falling down upon the moist grass around the glade.

We waited till the morning, on the doorstep of our home, me sleeping when Jess opened her eyes and awake from midnight to dawn. Then I awoke her. A stranger was coming, not one of those who were so proud, the former day, but another, a very young one, with no beard and no flames in his eyes ... in her eyes, for she was not a young boy but a young girl, as I saw clearly when she came and stood only one step in front of me. I glanced upon my shoulder at Jess, her mind was elsewhere and I dare not disturb her when there is no need to. I held my breath and, returning to the stranger, I stretched out my arm and I touched her cheeks. They were as soft as my little May's. The stranger smiled and I smiled and Jess, coming out of her dreams, was smiling too.

"Well," said the stranger - and her voice was disturbing, not soft at all as I expected but raucous, like a tree cracking when comes Spring - "well, you know I'm real, by now ?"

I was not sure, but before I could say so, Jess was answering:

"Of course, we do."

"Then," went on the girl, "there is nothing to be afraid of ?.. I taught the others, but ..." she added to herself.

"Nothing," said Jess, "nothing at all."
"Do you mean it ?"
"I do."

"May I tell the others to come ?"

I sensed Jess withstanding at once. She said nothing for a while. The stranger was there, swinging from one foot to the other, her eyes straight in mine. Strange, I thought, why in my eyes when I'm not speaking, when it's Jess who takes care of all?

"No," said Jess all of a sudden, and then, quite immediately: "Yes, you may. But no more than two or three of them."

There was a time of confusion after what we found ourselves all seated in front of the house, Jess on the doorstep, as an obstacle for the children who wanted to play with the strangers. Them, as calm as if they were no strangers, they talked to each other and then, there was a great silence and the girl began:

"Do you know who we are ?"
I said yes with my head.

"Do you know that we are brothers, you and us?"

Again, I nodded, but with no conviction. And Jess was no more assured than I was. The girl felt this and added, hastily:

"But you must know this! We said it a hundred times to you! You don't think we are fooling you? We couldn't try to, isn't it?"

Her eyes were always in mine, I felt uncomfortable but couldn't help looking at her. Were we actually brothers? Was it possible for her kind and mine to be the same kind of people? No, said my mind.

"No," I said, nevertheless, "you could not."

Jess threw back Ted who was nearly out.

"Wait !" she said. "You are after Man, aren't you?"

"Yes, we are, but why ..."

"Why what? You are after Man and that doesn't matter much if we are brothers or not brothers, that is what I find."

She finds always unexpected ways of thinking. She was already strange when I sought for her a couple of years ago. Never, never can I foretell ...

"Now, listen," she went on, sweeping away their stammerings. "Yesterday, you came, excited like mad cats, bawling and shouting: WHERE ARE THEY? SHOW US ONE! WHERE ARE THEY? And now you babble babble of brothers and ... and sisters, no? But that won't go, that won't go! I'll answer questions, I alone, and you'll ask what you have to ask. After what ... after what the storm may come if you are not far away from here."

I can say they were puzzled. I was. Maybe she was jealous, but I don't think so. It must have been something else ... something more important to her eyes ... to her mind, I thought.

"Well," said at last one of them, a male, this time, with a beard as long as mine but of which he took better care maybe, "you no doubt are right."

Though I saw in his eyes something of a shadow, a sorrow, a regret.

"Then," he went on, "where are they ?"

"Men?" said Jess, although she was pretty sure that that was the question. "They are everywhere, I think. They look at us from everywhere. They have machines for that."

"Machines?" said the stranger, but that was not exactly an interrogation. "We have machines too, but not the sames. And?.."

"Are there many of them ?" asked another.

"Not too many, as we can gather," answered quietly Jess. "Earth is no longer safe for them, you see?"

"Yes, but ... is it true that if there was not a man left upon this Earth, their power would be far less important?"

Jess shrugged her shoulders.

"Who am I to answer such a question? You may ask them yourselves!"

"Where ?"

"They dwell in the Great Town, not too far in the South," I said. "You must follow ..."
"Would you help us?" interrupted the girl.

"Why, sure! It's no more than two days from here."

Again Jess shrugged her shoulders.

"Here is not the question," she said firmly. "You may go if you want but you won't return, don't you know, fool as you are?"

"What ?" exclaimed one of them, eyes wide open. "They kill you ?"

"No, not at all," explained Jess. "But they keep the fools who can't take care of themselves and working hard is their share."
"Why?"

"There are not too many left, not enough men to handle all what they must handle, that's why."

"But can't you fly away ?"

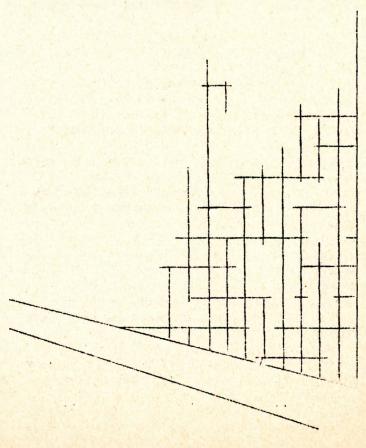

"Nothing. They are much more powerful than you think."

They smiled, all of them, an odd smile which made my mind whirl.

"You may smile, fools, you may smile." cried Jess, "but they are like Gods for us."

"Like Gods, indeed!" grinned the girl.
"And may I ask why?"

"Why! Why! Don't you know they created us, long before going to the stars? Have you ever seen one of them? They are not only far more beautiful than us, they are not only far more powerful, but they are kind, they gave us this very Earth, as a free gift and for the eternity to come. That is why you fools won't fool them !"

I saw bewildered faces in my life, but none so amazed than the stranger's after these words which I thought we had sent them a thousand times when they asked us through the immensity of spaces. But that was evidently the first time they heard this, which is History for us. And they claimed to be our brothers !...

"How a brother can't know what his brother knows ?" I asked.

But they were listening no longer. They debated, in their own tongue, what Jess had just said. After a long time, they came again to us and asked:

"So, you say Men created you. Your race, you no doubt mean by this? Not just you both ?"

"No," answered Jess with a slight smile, "it's our whole race they created out of nothing."

"Out of nothing, are you sure ?"

"Out of nothing."

Silence, and again they argued together, And again one, the girl this time, said :

"Out of nothing, good. And then ?.."

"And then ?.. Oh yes, then they went to the stars."

"Didn't it occur to you ..."

The girl was undecided for a while, but went on :

"Didn't it occur to you that this could be a mistake ?"

"A mistake ? Going to the stars ?"

"No, no. A mistake which permitted your race to grow."

Jess smiled gently, as if they were children asking silly questions.

"Sure, that was a mistake," she said. "Are new men not always made from the mistakes of the Gods ?"

I never had thought of this, but it was clever, indeed. But the others weren't satisfied.

"You misunderstood me," went on the girl, "But we can't go far, this way. Please, explain exactly how your race was created by Man."

Jess thought a little while, and :

"Well," she said, with an hesitation, "I don't know all, naturally. But what I know, I know. I may put it this way: there was once Man ... or better : there were once Men and they were alone upon this Earth of ours, and they went and went, increasing in wealth and knowledge, and a time came when they began to play with things, and things were hard to play with, so they played, not knowing exactly the rules, but they played nonetheless, and the times went and one day they found what were the rules, but it was a little too late and they were bound to go to the stars, far away from this Earth which was no longer safe for them, and then they thought that it was a pity to let this green-haired and lovely world to mere brute beasts, and they thought that they might as well give it to new men who could live where they could no longer themselves live, and they thought a little further and there we are, isn't it wonderful ?"

A long, long silence, and a voice, a little scared voice - how could I understand that they had to be scared ! - a little voice arose :

"You said there were a little of them still here ?"

"Yes, because they couldn't go away all at once. They had to prepare a lot of ships spaceships, as they call them - and the more of them were gone, the less they had hands to make other ships. Now they are all hiding themselves in the Great City of the South, wherein the Death which is now Earth for them can't get, and every night we see flashes going straight in the sky and die far, far above the sky. There may be none of them left, right now, who knows?"

There was a kind of despair in the stranger's eyes. They were no longer excited. They didn't even seem to feel the sun which fell right on their shoulders, burning them who were not acquainted with it. They didn't think of begging something to eat and though hungry I said nothing to trouble them.

At last, the girl spoke again and the eyes were on her lips.

"They created you, no doubt, they created you. And you are so exactly like us that they might as well have created us too. But that's impossible. Impossible. Our race is so incredibly old. Eons and eons have followed the streams of time since we discovered the use of fire. This is our sixth travel through space from our Empire to this Earth. We know you said the truth: Man created you. And after that, or maybe a little before, or at the same time - that has no importance - Man went to the stars and since he went, we meet him always, everywhere, in this Galaxy, scattered among the planets and the stars, looking with eyes wide open at alien suns, crossing our path in every corner of our realm. And they came from here, from this very planet which you and they call Earth. There is something incredible in this."

"Why?" said I. "They are like Gods. Nothing is impossible for them to do!"

"Nothing," aknowledged the girl, "nothing at all," she repeated, looking at me, and, now, I was the child. "Nothing: they created you, you are like us, hence you may infer that they created us too."

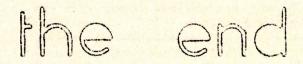

She got up, abruptly, and the others got up too. She looked at the sky, which was empty, she looked at me again, sharply, and then smiled with sorrow and said in a low voice:

"But, you gentle fool, we created them, eons and eons ago, because we were so lonely, the only thinking race in the Galaxy, alone, always alone, as far as we went, so we created them as to play with them and to have children to love and later brothers to do things with, marvelous things in this Galaxy and in other Galaxies, and we watched them, we came, after that, four times as to see how they grew, and they grew well. The first time, we created them, we have the records kept on far Gwondana, far at the other end of this Galaxy, we created them the first time we came upon this Earth, and four times we came again and again as to see how they were, if they went well, and the sixth time, it is to hear that they created us? Us? You gentle fool ..."

She couldn't say more. A storm was rising in my mind, and another in the mind of Jess. I don't know how they went to their whirling engine, but I never saw in my life such a phenomenon. The two storms came together, one from the East - it was mine - and the other from the West, and they boiled just above us. We went in our house, finding trouble to shut the door. All around us was lighted by the magnificent fire which the sky gives the earth and which the earth gives back the sky. I looked through the window, thinking and thinking.

"Who is the first to give and who the first to give back?" I asked Jess, but Jess was busy with the weeping children.

JEN ...

this ffm number 1, despite its number, is something of an anniversary issue, being the sixth ffm put out of versins' head in versins' hands and out of versins' hands in post-office, whence it was sent to you.

As to permit me to breathe a little while before ffm ending number five, bound to happen the lrst of october, and since the story you have read was already written just after mailing ffm number four, I sent this straight ffm No 1 the 15th of august. Which subtlety gives me two (2) months of fanacations.

Am I not wise?

__ook nonetheless ahead for ffm ending number five.

It'll be the ONLY fanmag NOT to give you news and reports from the LONDON CONVENTION

Is not that a title for your perennial gratitude?

Now, I remain your pet ... er ... your Pete, I mean !
