Rohndahl climbed out of his car. The lights up ahead signified a city. It was rather odd, for Rohndahl knew that no city should be there. After all, it WAS an unusual place for architects to plan a city, but at the same time it was something Rohndahl had planned and dreamed of for years. The city that Sinclair saw before him had it's foundation exactly in the center of Lake Kikichon!

Rohndahl saw the huge buildings exactly as he had so often seen them on the many drawings he had made. And now, in the short space of ten minutes the entire city had been constructed. Built out of the center of the black waters of Lake Kikichon.

Rohndahl climbed back into his car. He stepped on the starter and drove up the great highway to the gates of the city. He opened the car door, got out, and started walking toward the nearest building.

It towered high in the air, a shining, gleaming tower of plastic color. It was breathtaking.

"Strange," thought Rohndahl, "That I can see it so clearly in the dark." Then he realized that the lights were part of the buildings!

The giant tower was marvelous. It was a dream that had come real. Rohndahl walked on toward it. He entered the plastic giant and stared at the galaxy of color. He had never dreamed that his city would be at all like this. He wandered through the myriad rooms of the tower. It seemed as if he could never see all the rooms in this single building.

He rushed out of the first collossi into the next. And the next.. And then he found the cornerstone.

"THE CITY STRETH. . . . Architect: Sinc..ai. Rohnd.hi. . . . built 6899AB. . . . " 6899 AB! And the AB?

6899. And what did the AB mean?

Then he remembered a piece he had read in the paper a few days ago. "This year is not 1947 AD. It is 2 AB. Two years After the Bomb!

He couldn't be dreaming. . . or in the future. . . or. . . .?

He decided that he might be.

Six thousand, eight hundred and ninty nine years from now.

Or rather six-eight-nine-seven years from now.

Or could it be six-eight-nine-seven years ago? He rushed on to as to find an accurate record.

He found the record room three buildings further.

"The City Streth was constructed in the year 6899 Ab from designs found in the Museumn of Natural History. These plans, thought to be years ahead of their time, were drawn up by Sinclair Rohndahl.
